A variety of sensors, wearable devices, apps, diagnostic tests, and other technologies are contributing to new data-centric conceptions of personal health and identity.

We have identified tensions that shape the design of systems, technologies, and emerging policies in these areas.